

MAN MATTERS · SHILAJIT GUMMIES

Customer Persona Playbook

Tejas · Aakash

Demographics · Psychographics · Drivers · Barriers · RTBs · Communication

---

Man Matters · Internal · Feb 2026 · Based on 274 customer data points across North, West, Tier 1/2

TEJAS

34 – 45 · Gym Goer · Tier 1 / 2

“Gym toh kar raha hu but between the gym and getting home, the day just grinds me down.”

DEMOGRAPHICS

|                |                                                                                                                                                                             |
|----------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Age            | 34 – 45. Sweet spot 36–42. Old enough to feel aging, young enough to fight it.                                                                                              |
| Income         | ₹10–25L per year. Has disposable income, won't mind paying for a ₹1000 supplement                                                                                           |
| City           | Tier 1 and large Tier 2 - Delhi, Mumbai, Pune, Lucknow, Indore, Nagpur. Often travels between cities for work.                                                              |
| Occupation     | Business owner, senior professional, sales or client-facing role. High-output job. Frequently travels or hectic work schedule                                               |
| Marital status | Married. Might have children. Family is central to his self-image.                                                                                                          |
| Exercise       | Gym 3–5x per week. Strength training. Consistent but not competitive - no competitions, no shredding goals. Trainer-guided.                                                 |
| Supplements    | Will be into either whey protein, post-workout, biotin, ashwagandha, magnesium, omega-3. Shilajit is an add-on, not his anchor.                                             |
| Coffee / Tea   | Black coffee. As a pre-workout stimulant or an energy kick they consciously deploy. There is no emotional attachment to it.                                                 |
| Diet           | Structured but not tracked. Breakfast: upma, poha, oats, dosa. Lunch: protein + dal or khichdi. Dinner: lighter. High awareness, imperfect execution. Not calorie-counting. |
| Sleep          | 8+ hours. No sleep anxiety.                                                                                                                                                 |

PSYCHOGRAPHICS

Tejas is not a fitness person. He is a performance person who uses fitness as infrastructure.

|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
|----------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Identity | He defines himself through output - business, family, presence. The gym is the thing that keeps the machine running, not the machine itself. He did not start working out because he loved fitness. He started because he saw himself declining. Original triggers: hair loss, white hairs appearing, skin texture changing, energy dropping. Saw parents looking tired at his kid's school function and felt a fear he hasn't named but acts on every day. |
|----------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

|                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Core emotional driver             | “Daughter should feel proud — yes, he is my father.” Not abs. Not a podium. Dignity. Looking like a man who has it together at 40. Not the tired dad at the back of the school hall.                                                                                                                                    |
| Relationship with science         | “Science toh samajh nahi aata utna.” He does not read studies. He does not evaluate ingredients. His filter is: trainer said so, trusted friend tried it, no side effects reported. Word of mouth is his only purchase engine. Strong Affinity towards natural                                                                        |
| Relationship with coffee          | Coffee is strategic, not social. Might even drink black coffee. That shift was conscious: he changed something in his life and it stuck. He uses coffee as a fuel tool at two fixed moments: morning ignition and a pre-evening push. He is not fighting a crash. He is fuelling specific windows.                                           |
| The gap he feels but doesn't name | He has the gym covered. He has the night stack covered. But 10 AM to 7 PM - the work day, the travel, the meetings, the client pressure - his stack doesn't touch that window. His energy in those hours is running on gym residue and caffeine. That's the gap. Shilajit lives there.                                                       |
| Aspiration vs reality             | He wants to look good — not shredded. The goal is not transformation. The goal is not declining. He compares himself to peers his age who look tired. He does not want to be that. He cuts sugar, drinks black coffee, goes to the gym three to five times a week. These are deliberate choices, not obsessions.                             |
| Format matter                     | He travels 15 days a month. Resin is impossible - messy, temperature-sensitive, needs preparation. The gummy format is not a preference. It is the only format that works with his life. He literally packs his coffee in a small container when he travels. A supplement that requires a spoon and warm water will be forgotten on day two. |

WHAT DRIVES HIM TO BUY

|                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Primary driver   | Work exhaustion - not gym exhaustion. The verbatim from your actual Tejas: “Energy boost chahiye, work ki wajah se exhaust ho jate hai.” He goes to the gym. He has protein. He has pre-workout. But the 10-hour work day in between destroys him. That is what he is trying to solve. Not his squat. His meeting at 4 PM.                  |
| Secondary driver | Visible aging anxiety. Hair loss. White hairs. Skin. Energy dropping noticeably. He sees it. He fights it. Shilajit sits in this frame when positioned as vitality maintenance, not performance enhancement. The rasayana angle — systemic rejuvenation — is his quiet subtext. He will not say it but he knows it.                         |
| Purchase trigger | Trainer. Then trusted peer. He does not research. He does not google. His trainer is the authority on what goes in his body. If the trainer recommends, he buys. If a gym-going friend says it worked for him, he buys. Social media ads plant the seed but the trainer or friend waters it. Without that second step, he does not convert. |

WHAT MAKES HIM CHURN

|                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Barrier 1 | No WOM = no purchase. He does not self-initiate on supplements. If the trusted source (trainer, friend) stops mentioning it, it leaves his radar. Your trainer network is his purchase channel. Losing trainer advocacy loses Tejas.                                                                              |
| Barrier 2 | Science language alienates. If the ad leads with Shilabsorb, DBPs, mitochondrial ATP — he switches off. He said it plainly: “science toh samajh nahi aata.” Any creative that leans on clinical proof without human translation will lose him at the hook.                                                        |
| Barrier 3 | No tangible mid-day signal. He sleeps 8+ hours, he works out consistently. His baselines are strong. The Shilajit effect has to show up as something he can point to during the work day — less depleted at the 3 PM meeting, better in the evening drive home. If the effect is invisible, he de-prioritises it. |
| Barrier 4 | Side effects break the trust instantly. He specifically checks for acidity and sleep disruption. Those are his two red lines. If either appears, it's gone. No second chance.                                                                                                                                     |
| Barrier 5 | Format friction on the road. If the product requires preparation or is inconvenient to travel with, it gets left at home and the habit breaks within the first travel week.                                                                                                                                       |

REASONS TO BELIEVE

|              |                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|--------------|-----------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RTB 1 | TRAINER TRUSTED / WORD OF MOUTH  | His #1 purchase filter. Trainer testimonial or peer review outperforms any ad claim. Trainer channel is not optional — it is his primary purchase pathway.                                                                                                      |
| RTB 2 | NO ADDED SUGAR                   | He consciously cut milk coffee when he started the gym. That was an act of discipline. No added sugar in the gummy aligns with that same deliberate mindset. He has earned this. Frame it as consistent with choices he already made — not as a health warning. |
| RTB 3 | GUMMY FORMAT — TRAVEL COMPATIBLE | Resin requires preparation. He packs his life in a carry-on. The gummy is the only format that keeps the habit alive when he's on the road. This is not a preference — it's a functional necessity.                                                             |
| RTB 4 | 60% FULVIC ACID — VIA SHILABSORB | Do not lead with the science. But have it available when the trainer asks or when he searches. The 60% standardisation vs unbranded resin is the credibility backstop, not the hook. Trainer-facing material needs this clearly explained.                      |
| RTB 5 | STACK-ADDITIVE POSITIONING       | He already takes pre-workout, protein, ashwagandha, magnesium. This fills the mid-day gap his current stack ignores. Frame it as the missing layer between his morning gym and his night stack — not as a replacement for anything.                             |

The frame for Tejas:

“The gym is doing its job. Your work day is undoing it. This fills the gap.”

| Hook                      | Copy / Direction                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|---------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Primary hook       | “Gym toh kar raha hai. Par recover bhi utna hi ho raha hai?”Not about fitness. About the gap between gym output and daily recovery.                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Tone               | Peer-to-peer. Confident. No preaching. Not a health lecture. A working man talking to another working man.                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| What to say        | Energy that holds through the work day, not just the workout. Fills the mid-day gap. No added sugar - consistent with going black coffee. No acidity, no sleep disruption. Trainer recommended. Works with your existing stack.                                                                     |
| What NOTto say     | Do not say: 100% Natural / Ayurvedic (not his entry point). Do not say: Testosterone booster (too blunt, sounds like a problem he hasn’t admitted). Do not lead with clinical science. Do not show gym transformation imagery. He is not trying to be shredded.                                     |
| Chai / Coffeeangle | Coffee is sacred. Do not position Shilajit as a coffee replacement or alternative. He uses coffee for two specific moments. Shilajit fills the hours between. Keep these separate.                                                                                                                  |
| Influencerprofile  | 38–42. Goes to the gym, looks good for his age, not extreme. Has a demanding job. Speaks about work-life-gym balance without being preachy. Trainer energy, not athlete energy. Hinglish. Someone who says “yeh mere existing supplements ke saath acha kaam karta hai” not “this changed my body.” |
| Format             | 60–90 sec video. Trainer testimonial or gym-going peer format. Instagram and YouTube. Show the mid-day window — not the gym, not bedtime. The 2 PM meeting, the travel, the evening drive.                                                                                                          |
| Retention message  | Day 7: “Noticing less depletion between gym and end of work day? That’s it working.”Day 21: “Most users report holding energy longer through demanding work days by week 3.”                                                                                                                        |

AAKASH

30 – 42 · Non-Gym · Tier 1 / 2

“3 baje jo hota hai — woh thakan nahi hai. Mujhe laga sab ke saath hota hai. Hota nahi hai.”

DEMOGRAPHICS

|                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|----------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Age            | 30 – 42. Largest cluster is 31–41.                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Income         | ₹5–12L per year. Middle income. Price-conscious on supplements - ₹1,000 is a considered spend, not impulse.                                                                                                                                    |
| City           | Tier 1 and Tier 2 — Delhi, Lucknow, Pune, Indore, Patna, Nagpur. Tier 2 skews more Ayurvedic in worldview.                                                                                                                                     |
| Occupation     | Desk-based professional, shopkeeper, business owner with sedentary operations. Seated 8–10 hours a day. The job may be mentally demanding but physically inactive.                                                                             |
| Marital status | Married. Has family responsibilities. Health is increasingly on his mind but action has been limited to small moves.                                                                                                                           |
| Exercise       | Rarely or occasionally. Maybe walks in the evening - irregularly. Might do light yoga. Gym is not part of his identity or routine.                                                                                                             |
| Supplements    | Almost none. In both North and West calling data, non-gym buyers had zero supplement stack — one person had multivitamins. Shilajit is not an addition to a stack. It IS his health act. This is the entirety of what he is doing for himself. |
| Tea habit      | Tea with sugar, 3 times a day. Morning, post-lunch, evening. The post-lunch tea is explicitly a slump-beater. It has sugar. It spikes him, then crashes him worse. He is feeding the problem he is trying to solve and does not realise it.    |
| Diet           | High carbohydrate. Rice, roti, dal. Lunch is the heaviest meal. Does not track anything. Defines healthy as: fruits, dry fruits, juices. Has not connected diet to his afternoon crash.                                                        |
| Sleep          | Inconsistent. Watches TV and falls asleep. Does not have a defined sleep time. Wakes up without feeling rested on many days — some West data shows morning fatigue even before any activity.                                                   |

Aakash is not avoiding health. He thinks he is doing health. He just has the wrong tools.

|                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Identity                    | He does not see himself as unfit. He sees himself as a normal person with a busy life. He eats fruit. He has juice. He walks sometimes. In his frame, he is making reasonable efforts. The belly is noted but not discussed. The 3 PM crash is accepted as life. He has normalised both.                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| His healthworldview         | Natural = safe = good. This is his complete filter. Ayurvedic, Himalayan, plant-based, no chemicals — these words open the door. Anything that sounds like a lab product, a sports supplement, or a gym product closes it. He is not anti-supplement. He is anti-complexity. Shilajit appeals to him because it sounds ancient and simple.                                                                                                                                                     |
| The crash he lives with     | His 2–3 PM crash is both physical AND cognitive. West region data specifically surfaced “Better Focus & Mental Clarity” as an expected benefit — twice. He is not just physically tired. His brain stops working. He cannot concentrate. He reads the same email three times. He makes excuses to avoid decisions. This is the more honest pain point: 3 baje dimag bhi kaam karna band kar deta hai.                                                                                   |
| Tea &amp; guilt             | He drinks 3 teas with sugar a day. He is aware this is not ideal. He has probably tried cutting down. His post-lunch tea is an act of self-medication, not pleasure. He reaches for it because he has no other option. The guilt around sugar is latent but real — especially in the 40+ bracket where diabetes is a background anxiety. The “no added sugar” message from Chicory Root is not just a product claim for Aakash. It is a resolution to a conflict he carries quietly every day. |
| Purchase behaviour          | He is the impulse buyer. Verbatim: “ Aase hi le liya, bohot ads dekhi toh le liya. ” Low barrier to first purchase. Catastrophic barrier to second. He bought it without conviction. The product has to earn conviction in the first 7 days or it is over. No expectation was set at the point of purchase, so he has invented his own — and it is unrealistic.                                                                                                                         |
| What he wants from Shilajit | To feel like himself at 4 PM. That is the complete ambition. Not transformation. Not the gym body. Not energy to run a marathon. Just: not collapsing by afternoon, being able to think clearly, being present when he gets home. The bar is low. The product clears it easily — if we tell him that is what to look for.                                                                                                                                                                      |

WHAT DRIVES HIM TO BUY

|                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|-------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Primary driver   | The 2–3 PM cognitive and physical crash. He experiences it every day without exception. Post heavy carb lunch, blood sugar crashes, circadian dip hits simultaneously, and his post-lunch sugary chai amplifies the rebound. He has no name for what is happening but he feels it acutely. An ad that opens with this exact moment — the heavy eyes, the re-read email, the chai that doesn’t help — will stop his scroll. Not energy in general. This specific 45-minute window. |
| Secondary driver | Wanting to be healthy without changing his life.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

|                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|-------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|                         | He is not going to join the gym. He is not going to change his diet. But he wants to do something. Shilajit is the easiest health decision he can make — one gummy, natural ingredients, no routine disruption. The format does the selling. The natural claim opens the door.                                                                                                                                          |
| Purchase trigger | Ad catches him at the right moment, WOM seals it.West data: 33% of non-gym purchases are driven by word of mouth — family or friend. He buys impulsively from ads but converts reliably when someone he knows has tried it. The WOM trigger is especially strong in West. In North, social media ads drive him — but they need to hit him in the right emotional window: right after the crash, not at 9 AM. |
| Latent driver    | Better immunity and general vitality — the backstop goal.In both North and West non-gym data, “Better Immunity” surfaced multiple times as an expected benefit. This is his “being a healthier person” aspiration in proxy form. He cannot commit to the gym but he can commit to a gummy that makes him feel like he is doing something for his health.                                                     |

WHAT MAKES HIM CHURN

|                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|--------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Barrier 1 Most critical | Bought without conviction. Churns when nothing is obvious by Day 14. He has no supplement literacy. No reference frame. He paid ₹1,000 and invented his own expectation: a feeling he can point to within 2 weeks. Nobody told him what to look for. The product may be working. He does not know it. Without a Day 1 expectation message, this barrier is guaranteed to kill retention.                                                                   |
| Barrier 2               | Consistency failure. No ritual anchor. He does not have a supplement routine. He does not take protein post-workout. He does not have a night stack. Shilajit is a standalone act with no natural trigger in his day. Within 10 days of buying, he has taken it twice. “Consistency is an issue.” The 2 PM ritual anchor — take it instead of reaching for the post-lunch chai — is the fix. Replace an existing behaviour rather than building a new one. |
| Barrier 3               | Side effect anxiety — concentrated in 40+ buyers. Three fears, all unaddressed in current creative and packaging: liver heat in summer, suitability for 40+, sugar and diabetes. These fears are explicitly documented in verbatim across North and West. The 40+ non-gym buyer is Aakash’s older version — and he is more likely to abandon over an unanswered fear than any other reason.                                                                |
| Barrier 4               | The Kapiva scar. 30% of non-gym buyers had used Shilajit before — from a chemist, an unbranded source, or Kapiva. It did not work. They stopped. Now they are cynical first-time Man Matters buyers. The message needs to explain why the previous product failed them — not just claim to be better. The Shilabsorb vs raw resin story does this. But it needs to be in simple language, not clinical.                                                    |

REASONS TO BELIEVE

|              |                              |                                                                                                                |
|--------------|------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| RTB 1 | 100% NATURAL — ORIGIN | This is his entry condition, not a purchase preference. 8 out of 8 non-gym buyers in both North and West chose |
|--------------|------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

|       |                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
|-------|--------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
|       |                                                                    | Natural over Scientific. Zero exceptions. If it does not feel natural, Ayurvedic, and ancient — he does not open the door. Everything else is secondary to this.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| RTB 2 | NO ADDED SUGAR —CHICORY ROOTSWEETENED             | He has 3 sugary teas a day and feels latent guilt about it. “No added sugar” resolves a conflict he carries quietly. But the Chicory Root story is the real unlock: it is a natural prebiotic, cooling not heating, GI of 2, safe for diabetic-adjacent concerns. This is not just a claim — it is the answer to his sugar anxiety, his liver heat fear, and his diabetes concern simultaneously. Front-of-pack. Not fine print. |
| RTB 3 | AYURVEDIC RASAYANA— ANCIENT VALIDATION                 | He does not need clinical trials. He needs to feel like this is something humans have done for centuries. Shilajit as a rasayana — systemic rejuvenation, used in Ayurvedic tradition for energy and vitality — is the frame that makes him feel safe. Ancient is more trustworthy than tested for this persona.                                                                                                                 |
| RTB 4 | GUMMY FORMAT —EASIEST SUPPLEMENTHE WILL EVER TAKE | No preparation. No measuring. No powder. No resin dissolving in warm water. One gummy. At 2 PM. Instead of the chai that was not working anyway. The format does the consistency work for him. The ritual anchor is already built in: replace the post-lunch tea reach with a gummy reach.                                                                                                                                       |
| RTB 5 | 3RD PARTY LAB TESTED— NORTH CLOSER                     | In North, lab tested is the Rank 2 closer (4 votes). After the natural hook lands, the lab seal builds the final trust bridge. For West, No Added Sugar takes this role. Use the lab seal in North-targeted creative at the product page or end card. Do not lead with it — it closes, it does not open.                                                                                                                         |

COMMUNICATION & NARRATIVES

The frame for Aakash:

“The most natural thing you can do for your afternoon. No gym required. No life change needed. Just this.”

| Hook           | Copy / Direction                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
|----------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Primary hook   | “3 baje jo neend aati hai — woh thakan nahi hai. Wo fix ho sakti hai.”Open on the exact moment. Not energy in general. This specific cognitive fog at this specific time.                                                                                                                                   |
| Claim sequence | In this exact order: (1) 100% Natural / Himalayan Shilajit. (2) No added sugar — Chicory Root sweetened. (3) Ayurvedic tradition — centuries of use. (4) One gummy. That’s it. Do not deviate from this sequence. Natural opens him. Sugar resolves his guilt. Ayurvedic validates. Simple format converts. |

|                                    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Tone                        | Non-judgmental. Gentle. Inclusive. He has not joined the gym. He is not going to. That is fine. This is for him, as he is. Do not make him feel like he should be doing more. Make him feel like this is exactly enough.                                                                                 |
| Chai angle                  | Post-lunch chai IS the behaviour being replaced. But frame it as relief, not deprivation. "Your morning chai? Keep it. The 3 PM chai that doesn't even work? You won't need it anymore." Do not say chai is bad. Say this works better.                                                                  |
| What NOT to say             | Do not say: gym, stamina, testosterone, protein, performance, shredded, muscle gain, pre-workout. Do not use any imagery from a gym. Do not use clinical language. Do not reference weight or belly. Do not frame as transformation. This is maintenance. This is normalcy restored.                     |
| North vs West closing claim | North: Lead Natural → close with Third Party Lab Tested. West: Lead Natural → close with No Added Sugar. Same persona, same product, different anxiety being resolved at checkout.                                                                                                                       |
| Influencer profile          | 35–42. Non-gym. Looks like Aakash — not lean, not transformed. Talks about everyday wellness. Has a demanding job or family. Speaks in Hindi/Hinglish. Says "Gym nahi jata but kuch toh karna chahiye tha — yeh easy tha." Not a fitness account. A normal person who made one small change.             |
| Retention message           | Day 1: "Le lo 1 gummy 2 baje — lunch ke baad, chai se pehle. Exactly is waqt." Day 7: "Ab tak notice kiya? 3 baje wali chai thodi kam urgent lagti hogi. Wahi sign hai." Day 21: "Zyadatar log 3rd week mein report karte hain — afternoon mein dimag clearer rehta hai, chai ki zaroorat kam hoti hai." |

Tejas vs Aakash — At a Glance

| [object Object]    | TEJAS                                                     | AAKASH                                             |
|--------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------|
| Age                | 34–45                                                     | 30–42                                              |
| Exercise           | Gym 3–5x/week                                             | Rarely / walks                                     |
| Supplement stack   | Full: protein, pre-workout, night stack                   | None. Shilajit is his entire health act.           |
| Energy dip         | Mid-day work depletion after morning gym                  | 2–3 PM cognitive + physical crash post-lunch       |
| Tea/Coffee         | Black coffee. Strategic. Two moments.                     | Sugary tea. 3x/day. Post-lunch = slump-beater.     |
| Real motivation    | Dignity. Looking good for his age. Daughter's pride.      | Feel like himself at 4 PM. No transformation.      |
| Purchase trigger   | Trainer WOM. Trusted peer.                                | Ad at the right moment. WOM in West.               |
| #1 RTB             | Trainer trusted + stack-additive positioning              | 100% Natural / Himalayan origin                    |
| #2 RTB             | No added sugar (consistent with his choices)              | No added sugar — Chicory Root (resolves guilt)     |
| Lead creative hook | "Gym toh kar raha hai. Par recover bhi utna ho raha hai?" | "3 baje jo neend aati hai — woh fix ho sakti hai." |
| What NOT to say    | Natural / Ayurvedic / science / testosterone              | Gym / stamina / performance / transformation       |
| Influencer type    | 38–42, active working dad, trainer energy                 | 35–42, non-gym, everyday wellness, normal guy      |
| Churn risk         | No WOM source / no mid-day signal                         | No expectation set / no ritual anchor              |